

Get Active!

Traditional Lifestyles

Traditionally, Aboriginal people led healthy, active lifestyles by hunting, fishing, gathering, cooking, preparing, and participating in traditional games and competitions such as lacrosse, wrestling, running, canoeing, archery, dancing, storytelling and singing (Hanna, 2008). Although these types of activities persisted for many generations, they have become less and less common which is evident in mounting social and health issues (Cochrane, 2008).

According to the First Nations Regional Longitudinal Health Survey, only 21% of First Nations adults and 45% of youth get sufficient physical activity (at least 30 minutes of moderate or vigorous physical activity) for health benefits (First Nations Centre, 2005).

What are the facts?

Canada's Physical Activity Guide to Healthy Active Living recommends 30 to 60 minutes of moderate exercise a day to maintain and improve health (Public Health Agency of Canada, 2003). Regular physical activity contributes to the prevention and control of several chronic diseases including cardiovascular disease, diabetes mellitus, hypertension, obesity, bone and joint diseases (osteoporosis and osteoarthritis), depression, some cancers (breast and colon cancer), and premature death (Warburton, Nicol, & Bredin, 2006).

Other benefits include feeling more energetic, sleeping better, stronger muscles and bones, increased self-esteem, reduced anxiety and stress, and an overall improvement in mental well-being (Fox, 1999). For children and youth specifically, these benefits also include opportunities for peer interaction (Bailey, 1999), increased social status (Chase & Drummer, 1992), and decreased loneliness (Page et al, 1992).

Active living is important to every aspect of our health: physical, mental, spiritual and emotional.

Tips to Get Active

Canada's Physical Activity Guide to Healthy Active Living recommends trying to be a little more active each day by doing healthy activities that you are familiar with and that you enjoy (Public Health Agency of Canada, 2003). If you haven't been active in awhile, it is important to start slowly and gradually progress towards physical activity goals that are meaningful to you. Involving friends and family in daily physical activity sessions is also a good way to socialize and stay motivated (Public Health Agency of Canada, 2003).
